	The pandemic introduced new approaches and means of work, education and learning, and a paradigm shifts in the delivery of public services.
	• What are some of the initial findings and lessons learnt?
	The high efficiency of public service delivery and uptake by the societies clearly shows that the reluctance of public administration and resistance to change has been costly. The last years have also shown the great potentials of public institutions in adopting to change as needed. How can we capitalise on some gains and best regulate the positive changes as we move to the next stage?
	Lots of efforts are needed to institutionalize the new boundaries (regulate hybrid work, regulate, and recognize online education as part of formal education, and so on. At this time of intersected crisis what lessons do we carry on to not allow that nature or human made crisis lead to disruption of basic public service delivery? What would be expert's advice on addressing these challenges?
	• How will these pathways above expedite the implementation of SDGs?

2:00 – 3:30 pm (1.5 hrs)	Expert Dialogue 6: Public Servants at the heart of building responsive governance through innovation.
	Moderator: Mr. John Nakabago (5 minutes opening/bio reading)
	Presentation on "Stagility: Ensuring stability and agility in institutions, leadership and public service workforce to build resilient and responsive governance" by Ms. Alketa Peci (15 minutes)
	Presentation on "The Role of Public Service and Public Servants during crisis <sup>2</sup> " by Mr. John-Mary Kauzya (15 minutes)
	Q&A: (10 minutes)
	Discussions: (45-50 minutes)
	The implementation of SDGs and the current crisis highlight the importance of public servants in designing public policy under changing and challenging situations, ensuring the public service business continuity and response through agility and innovation. This dialogue can discuss the public servants response through the ninth key roles of public servants, as highlighted in DPIDG/DESA paper respectively (i) ensuring continuity of public services; (ii) providing service before self; courage and humanness in practice (iii) quick thinking, creativity and innovation; (iv) information and awareness creation; (v) strategic thinking and planning amidst chaos; (vi) sustaining resilience and building a better effective and more responsive public service; (vii) building and enhancing State legitimacy, government credibility and people's trust; (viii) resource allocation and distributive accountability; and (ix) collaborative and networked leadership.
	In building resilient and responsive governance, we would need innovative approaches in leadership, institutions, and strategies, means of implementation such as human and financial resources, but above all, we will need a new public administration that would address systematic and emergency issues with a changed mindset. This dialogue can look at this intersection of state-people governance relationships and adoption of innovation in the implementation of the SDGs. • What are the lessons learned?
